58. North America was an arena of conflict between British and French colonialism in the mid-18th century. The British victory in the French and Indian War of 1754-63 settled this issue in Britain's favour, but disagreements between Britain and its thirteen North American colonies arose in the aftermath of the war. ---- Escalating conflict led them to unite in declaring independence in 1776 and, with French help, they defeated British efforts to suppress the rebellion, which led to the establishment of the United States of America.

- A) Most colonists who had remained loyal to Britain left the country, many moving to Canada, which remained in British hands.
- B) Born of an uprising against the British rule in 1776, the United States of America was a new kind of state embodying the principles of democracy.
- C) The new United States had an initial population of around 4 million, similar in size to the population of Ireland at that time.
- D) The war was followed by a burst of economic growth that radically changed the nature of the United States of America.
- E) Colonists disputing the right of the British Parliament to impose taxes and duties on them staged rebellious acts that provoked a repressive response.

59. In 1925, Le Corbusier, the Swiss-French architect suggested demolishing the homes, statues, and streets of much of Paris's Right Bank. In their place, he proposed erecting 18 glass towers, divided by lawns for pedestrians and elevated highways for cars. ---- A quote attributed to him leaves no doubt as to which side he was on: "Progress is achieved through experimentation; the decision will be awarded on the field of battle of the new."

- A) Le Corbusier contended that lovers of antique architecture and progressive thinkers were at war about how humans should live.
- B) Based on the need for security and housing, or other facilities, most people preferred to move to a new neighbourhood.
- C) High-rise buildings similar to those envisioned by Le Corbusier have recently been dotting various urban districts across China.
- D) Le Corbusier was one of the pioneers of modernism in architecture and insisted on this extraordinary suggestion.
- E) Some leaders suggested that we should live in dense urban areas with public transit and walkable facilities.

There is only one Turkish word that a foreigner should learn before visiting Gaziantep: fıstık (pistachio). This fast-paced and gourmet city is believed to harbour more than 180 pastry shops producing the world's most famous pistachio baklava. Other gastronomic treats are also on offer for adventurous foodie travelers. On the other hand, Gaziantep is also known for its historic places. Some of them, including the fortress, bazaars, caravanserai and old stone houses, have been recently restored. One of south eastern Anatolia's gateways, Gaziantep, formerly known as Aintab, has rarely been as full of confidence and hope for the future as it is today because it witnessed great conflicts and wars in history. By the time the Arabs conquered the town in 638, the Persians, Alexander the Great, the Romans and the Byzantines had all left their imprints on Gaziantep. The region was politically unstable until the Seljuk Turks arrived from the east around 1070. It was later taken over by the Ottomans in 1516 and has remained predominantly populated by Turks since then.

66. According to the passage, Gaziantep's cuisine ----.

- A) has always been popular among foodie travelers
- B) offers several different pastries made with pistachio
- C) is known worldwide for its pistachio baklava
- D) includes authentic foods from diverse civilisations
- E) has delicious dishes whose names tourists learn even before visiting the city

67. According to passage, some parts of the city having ancient heritage ----.

- A) have lately undergone some restorations
- B) attract tourists from all around the world
- C) have recently lost their past magnificence
- D) are now being renovated with extreme care to attract more tourists
- E) were under risk of demolition before they were restored

68. It is clearly stated in the passage that before the arrival of the Seljuk Turks, ----.

- A) great empires fiercely battled with each other in an effort to not surrender the city
- B) the Byzantines had the most significant impact on Gaziantep
- C) Gaziantep was a region that lacked political stability
- D) Turks mainly lived in regions neighbouring Gaziantep
- E) the city suffered from serious political conflicts caused by the Arabs

Do we all pursue happiness? Is happiness something that can be chased and sometimes captured? The phrase 'the pursuit of happiness' contains at least two major assumptions: firstly, happiness lies outside of us, out there in the world; and secondly, it is elusive, requiring intention and effort to capture it. The novels of Leo Tolstoy explore these assumptions in great depth. His books are filled with characters in feverish pursuit of happiness in many different ways. Yet few, if any, manage to attain it. Indeed, his stories often portray tempting yet deceptive pathways that promise happiness but end with disasters: soldiers seeking the glory of battle; young men and women plunging into the insanity of romantic love; greed addicts pursuing wealth, power, or status. They often experience a temporary bliss, which then fades away, leaving behind emptiness. True, sustainable happiness, as opposed to temporary pleasure, is a state of well-being and the harmony of all aspects of one's life – especially in relationships. But the more manically Tolstoy's characters pursue happiness, the more it escapes them. Hence the paradox in Tolstoy's works is that the pursuit of happiness seems to result in deep unhappiness.

69. According to passage the 'pursuit of happiness' as a phrase ----.

- A) means that one cannot really capture happiness because it is not within people's reach
- B) indicates that few people make an effort to attain true, sustainable happiness
- C) constitutes part of human nature that one should seek to attain through interaction
- D) implies that happiness is an external concept that could be chased and achieved
- E) is a title of one of Tolstoy's novels where he explores the nature of happiness

70. The author of the passage states that in Tolstoy's novels ----.

- A) characters seek happiness in various fields of life, having no satisfying and long-lasting outcomes
- B) the pursuit of romantic love as a means to attain happiness is ridiculed
- C) though the promise of happiness is deceptive, some characters could achieve it with ease
- D) characters seek to achieve bliss although they are aware of its temporary nature
- E) joining battles is shown to bring happiness to soldiers in every aspect of life

71. According to the author, the irony implied in Tolstoy's works is that ----.

- A) even though happiness is elusive in nature, it can still be attained if there is the will to do so
- B) the more one tries to attain happiness, the more sadness this chase leads to
- C) the harmony in one's relationships will not necessarily bring sustainable happiness
- D) the temporary bliss one feels later turns into intense happiness
- E) feverish pursuit of happiness is always bound to cause disasters in romantic love

Scientific academies and associations played a key role in the development of science prior to the 20th century, providing a way for scientists to meet with each other and sponsoring publications in journals and books as a way to disseminate scientific knowledge so that it could be shared by everyone. These roles have continued through the 20th century and into the 21st century. Scientific associations are usually found organized along national lines or within scientific disciplines. The Royal Society in the United Kingdom, founded in 1660, is the premier example of a national society; it has remained vigorous, publishing journals, funding research, and electing distinguished scientists to be fellows of the society. Other prominent national societies have played more important roles. The Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences, for instance, selects the winners of the scientific Nobel prizes and plays a much stronger role in promoting research in different fields and countries. National associations often function as a method to promote interdisciplinary research, as do the broader international associations. Today, almost every scientific discipline has an association that also engages in media relations, campaigns for funding and promotion of science as a way to knowledge. One of the best ways for historians to see that a scientific subdiscipline has been successfully created is to look for the founding of the accompanying association.

72. The underlined word in the passage 'disseminate' is closest in meaning to ----.

- A) refute
- B) spread
- C) possess
- D) substitute
- E) approve

73. It can be understood from the passage that the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences ----.

- A) was initially meant to be a national association but now functions as an international one
- B) is a less active association than the Royal Society in the UK although it has more international members
- C) is like the Royal Society in the UK in many ways even though it was founded much later
- D) is the most important international association that engages in media relations
- E) serves a remarkable function in the advancement of international research

74. According to the passage, scientific associations ----.

- A) were initially founded for the quick circulation of innovative interdisciplinary research
- B) are a sign of successful establishment of a scientific subdiscipline
- C) are criticised by scientists unless they support international and interdisciplinary research
- D) should commit themselves to research to encourage more Nobel prize winners
- E) give priority to fund-raising and receiving support through media relations

Life expectancy is the average number of years to be lived by an individual or a population at a given age. The term is often confused with a related term, life span, which refers to the age to which the longest-lived members of a species survive. The life expectancy of a country has been shown to be related to its socioeconomic development. Most countries that are classified as 'more developed' have higher levels of life expectancy at birth than most of the countries classified as 'developing'. While the US has a high level of life expectancy compared to that of the developing countries of the world, it ranks quite low in life expectancy among developed countries. Japan and most European countries including some in southern Europe have higher life expectancies at birth than the US for both males and females. In recent years, Japan has become the world leader in life expectancy at birth. The success of the Japanese in raising their levels of life expectancy has been due to large declines in mortality from heart disease relative to other developed countries.

75. We can infer from the passage that life expectancy ----.

- A) is a concept that developing countries pay more attention to
- B) is not as reliable as life span in evaluating the socioeconomic development of a country
- C) is noted as the most important difference between developed and developing countries
- D) could be used as an indicator of a country's level of socioeconomic development
- E) refers to the age to which the longest-lived members of a species can reach

76. It is stated in the passage that Japan ----.

- A) is the only developed country that has a higher life expectancy than the US
- B) is currently the country with the highest life expectancy in the world
- C) has been cooperating with countries in southern Europe to increase its life expectancy
- D) does better on life expectancy at birth, but not overall life expectancy
- E) has witnessed a dramatic improvement in life expectancy despite high mortality rates from heart disease

77. The passage is mainly about ----.

- A) the difference between life expectancy and life span
- B) how to increase life expectancy in developing countries
- C) life expectancy differences across genders
- D) international differences in life expectancy
- E) socioeconomic causes and outcomes of life expectancy

It has been estimated that the average child in the US spends more time each week watching TV than attending school. This is of great concern, as a surprisingly large proportion of what children watch is violent. Saturday morning cartoons, for example, present as many as twenty violent acts per hour. Despite this concern, the producers of violent programming have often continued to claim that children will not imitate what they see in those programmes. This claim has sounded unfounded to psychologists ever since Albert Bandura's classic 'Bobo doll' studies in the early 1960s. In his seminal experiment, Bandura showed pre-schoolers a film of an adult playing with a new toy, known at the time as a Bobo doll. The adult in the film committed abuse on the toy in various ways, punching it, kicking it, striking its head with a hammer, and throwing other toys at it, all the while clearly enjoying herself. The children were then led into a room with various toys in it, including the Bobo doll. Children who had seen the film were far more likely to beat up the doll than children who had not. This prompted Bandura to describe a new type of learning theory: social learning or modeling.

78. Children's excessive exposure to TV in the US is concerning because ----.

- A) most of the children do poorly on school subjects
- B) there is not enough empirical evidence on how it affects children
- C) producers admit that children may act out what they see on TV
- D) violence is present in much of the content children watch
- E) children mostly prefer violent TV shows to cartoons

79. The underlined word in the passage 'unfounded' is closest in meaning to ----.

- A) undeniable
- B) irreversible
- C) respectable
- D) groundless
- E) threatening

80. It can be understood from the passage that the experiment carried out by Albert Bandura is significant ----.

- A) but it has not received the attention it deserves over the decades
- B) because it was the first psychological experiment that used toys
- C) since it was conducted in collaboration with producers of TV programmes
- D) although more and more evidence now is in contradiction with its findings
- E) as it led to the development of a new type of learning theory
