Erich:

- Isn't it surprising that at difficult times, such as obligatory lockdowns, people don't feel gloomed and take up hobbies such as playing instruments. Figures showed that sales of instruments rose by 80 percent during a lockdown due to a strong storm that hit a major American county.

Peter:

- ----

Erich:

- I don't think so. The surveys suggest that people tried to learn instruments as they looked for ways to make use of the hours of enforced isolation.

Peter:

- People who want to make good use of their time don't miss out any opportunity, do they?

- 4
- A It's probably because they were inspired from their colleagues and friends who referred to instrument learning as a good pastime activity. leisure /free time activity
- B Probably learning a musical instrument appeared as an entertainment tool for people staying at home, especially for those who were alone.
- C It sounds pretty significant if we think that people were quite bored at home and wanted to improve themselves.
- D Perhaps it's because many people tried to earn a living by making music at home and selling it online.
- E It must be popular among people wanting to spend their time in ways that might otherwise be spent just watching TV during a lockdown.

68-71 : For these questions, choose the best rephrased form of the given sentence.

Being able to overcome challenges has less to do with willpower than with specific coping skills, such as managing scheduling problems and bouncing back after setbacks.

- A The ability to handle difficulties is largely related to certain coping skills like time management and getting over problems, compared to willpower which plays a smaller part.
- B Being capable of resolving difficulties cannot be explained with willpower as it requires various coping skills like time management and the ability to foresee problems.
- C In order to overcome difficulties, one needs willpower as well as certain skills to address problems such as time management and the capacity to turn back to normal soon.
- D Basically, it is willpower that enables one to overcome challenges, but certain skills like time management and the capacity to get over problems easily also help one tackle problems.
- E Even if people have great willpower, they cannot handle difficulties unless they have particular coping skills to manage time effectively and thus get over problems easily.

The meat industry's big public relations problem is that vegetarians are demonstrably healthier than meat eaters. If you do not eat beef, lamb or even chicken, your risk of heart disease and certain cancer is likely to be lower than that of the average meat-eating person. --- The only vegetarians who need to do anything special to prevent nutrient deficiencies are vegans, who eat no animal products whatsoever. If you follow vegan practices, you need to be sure to eat a variety of grains and beans to take in enough calories, and to find an alternative source for vitamin B12.

- (A) Eating meat might stimulate the growth of intestinal bacteria that produce carcinogenic or other toxic chemicals, or some other as yet unknown mechanism might be at work.
- (B) If you eat red meat, you can lower your risk by selecting leaner cuts, eating smaller portions, or choosing chicken, fish or beans as alternatives.
- (C) And as long as you eat any other animal product at all – dairy, fish, or eggs – you can avoid eating meat without affecting the nutritional quality of your diet.
- (D) Meat will never be completely free of bacteria, but you have every right to wonder why producers are not doing a better job of keeping their meats free of harmful ones.
- (E) Although some meat packages are labelled with nutrition messages – “only 70 calories per serving,” etc. – you will not easily find out the amount of saturated fat in the meat you buy.
