Professor:

- The number of people on the planet has dramatically increased since the middle of the 20th century. Much of this growth has taken place in the developing world, which is now home to more than 80 per cent of the population.

Student:

- So, these places must have vibrant economies, and their inhabitants are presumably well-off.

Professor:

Student:

- Unbelievable! Do you think these people live in grinding poverty and are bound to emigrate to other countries?

Professor:

- Good news is that this is changing, especially in nations such as China, India, and Brazil. New technologies and international trade have sparked rapid economic growth, and it's transforming how people live.

- A On the contrary, they are mostly poor and don't enjoy the living conditions those in the developed world take for granted.
- B Precisely! Many of the top-ten richest individuals are from such regions, making those spots even more attractive for investment.
- C No wonder that entrepreneurs are highly interested in such countries. Poor people will work for lower wages when compared to workers in rich countries.
- D The key for their accumulating wealth is satisfaction in life. These people are never longing for more, and they please themselves with the minimum.
- E There is no data on individuals' wealth; what is available to researchers is their social status and their means of subsistence.

The nature of past environments is a key aspect of archaeology because human action cannot be understood in isolation from its surroundings. For example, the lifestyle of a human group living in a densely forested area in a temperate climate would be very different from that of the same community inhabiting a treeless arctic landscape. ---- There may have been major changes in climate, sea level, soils, and plant and animal communities over the millennia. Thus a site occupying a coastal setting in the Mesolithic period might now lie several kilometres inland, or it might be completely submerged by the sea.

- (A) Until the 1970s, archaeology was concerned mainly with using structures and artefacts to produce a reconstruction of a site, and no attention paid to the surrounding environment.
- (B) On the other hand, environmental evidence usually consisted of animal bones and larger plant remains.
- (C) Furthermore, in the case of any individual archaeological site, it must be realised that the modern environment may bear little relationship to that of the past.
- (D) In wetlands, permanent waterlogging results in an oxygen-poor environment that reduces the level of microbial activity.
- (E) The reconstruction of past environments is based on many types of evidence, including long-term perspectives on climate change.

(I) Ray Charles, who was a pioneering American pianist and soul singer, changed the sound of popular music by combining the melodies and emotional fervour of African American gospel music with the secular lyrics and earthy sensibility of the blues. (II) He added elements of traditional pop, jazz, and country music in the course of becoming the single most important figure in the transition from the rhythm and blues of the 1950s to the soul music of the 1960s. (III) Charles was a gifted singer, pianist, arranger, and bandleader who truly deserved his oft-bestowed title of 'The Genius'. (IV) Beyond his skills as a live performer and recording artist, Charles was a canny entrepreneur, who founded his own recording, publishing, and management companies. (V) He became an international star who put his unmistakable vocal imprint on everything he sang, from low-down blues to Broadway show tunes to country ballads.
